It's Snowing Dreams & Jobs

Blizzards are not always the most welcome of storms, but in comparison to hurricanes, tornadoes and floods I'd say we got the prettiest of natural disasters on our side. The Career Quest New York trip was one that I'm sure will never be forgotten. No, not because of the snow storm, but because it was very clear that we were not going to let Mother Nature destroy the endless opportunities that were ahead of us.

Although we only experienced one day of site visits, it was clear that our Media & PR group was going to make the most of every minute we had with the employers we were visiting. We were met at each site with welcoming faces and the one of a kind New York Bagels (so naturally, I was sold). With the research we had done on each company I could tell each of us was excited and well prepared to ask the questions that had been burning on our brains since our first meeting.

However, the most refreshing component was the questions asked by others, whether it be our amazing group leader Amanda Rey, fellow Career Questers', or the professionals hosting our visit. This trip was about awareness and access. It allowed me to gain an understanding about a field I was interested in to narrow my personal job search and create a plan for the future.
